In general, the Tachi Uchi no Kurai set starts off with the bokuto (or saya bokuto) in the belt, working at a distance inside the usual maai. It then moves to kata which are performed at kenjutsu distance with the associated considerations of this maai. In other words we start with the swords already out and approach each other that way.

Tachi Uchi No Kurai is partner practice done with a Bokuto (wooden sword). During Ukenagashi I was working with one of our new members, and he blocked somewhat correctly then moved his sword for some reason and I nailed him in the head due to the tension of my sword against the tension of his block, which suddenly disappeared.

Tachi Uchi no Kurai. Tachi uchi no kurai is a form of kumitachi (paired sword form) practiced as part of Shinmei ryu and its branches. There is a seated set called Tsumi Ai no Kurai, but this is taught even less often than the Tachi set. The forms as practiced today are probably of relatively recent origin.

In last night's practice, we spent the entire time on the standing Musoshindenryu kata, Tachi-Uchi no Kurai. We managed to "see" and get the basic movements for the first three in the set. They include De-ai, Keikomi, and Ukenagashi. Thanks to an introduction I received from Kim Taylor at the Thunder Bay seminar last fall, his...
